Race undercuts discussion on affordability

Studies show an influx of Chinese millionaires is raising home prices in Vancouver. So why can't we talk about it?

IAN YOUNG VANCOUVER

It helps to have a thick skin when reporting on the nexus between Chinese money and Vancouver's sky-high property market. It also might help if that skin, like mine, isn't white.

Accusations of racism flow thick and fast whenever an attempt is made to connect wealth-based immigration, primarily by rich Chinese, and housing prices here. Since influential condo marketer Bob Rennie delivered a speech to the Urban Development Institute in May, in which he said "sensational" stories making that link were "bordering on racism," an array of industry figures have lined up to support his proposition.

But now, some in the Chinese community are pushing back. "Guys like Bob Rennie, they are trying to stop full conversation and intelligent conversation by using words like 'racism,' " said long-time Chinatown activist David Wong. "People are afraid to speak when people start throwing that word around." Mr. Wong, an architect who has campaigned on behalf of impoverished Chinese immigrants, said it was vital to have a frank discussion about the impact of rich immigrants on greater Vancouver, where average detached house prices top $1.2-million. "Every time people want to talk about this, they get labelled a racist, especially if they are non-Asian," said Wong. "That's nonsense. We've got to talk about it. The politicians are gutless because they are afraid they are going to lose the so-called ethnic

Mr. Rennie's May 15 speech was swiftly followed by a range of commentary that hewed closely to his line. On June 3, pro-development political consultant Bob Ransford warned in The Vancouver Sun that addressing unaffordability by restricting foreign ownership would "tread very close" to the historical discrimination of the anti-Chinese head

Two days later, University of British Columbia professor Tsur Somerville – whose Centre for Urban Economics and Real Estate is sponsored by developers Grosvenor and Henderson Development, as well as the Commercial Real Estate Development Association - told CKNW Radio that although ignoring the issue would be "foolish," the debate risked descending into "prejudice, ster-

Angela Li, centre, pitches properties by Vancouver developer Westbank Corp. at a booth in Shanghai. From 2005 to 2012, nearly 37,000 millionaire migrants moved to B.C. under an investor program. KEVIN LEE FOR THE GLOBE AND MAIL

Every time people want to talk about this, they get labelled a racist, especially if they are non-Asian. That's nonsense. We've got to talk about it. The politicians are gutless because they are afraid they are going to lose the so-called ethnic vote.

David Wong

Architect, Chinatown activist

eotypes and racism." Cameron Muir, chief economist for the B.C. Real Estate Association, meanwhile told The Vancouver Observer on June 5 that linking immigration to property prices "is beginning to sound suspiciously awkward."

The debate is certainly getting awkward, though perhaps not in the way Mr. Muir suggests. Brandon Yan, a Vancouver city planning commissioner, summed it up in a Twitter critique of Mr. Rennie's speech: "Let's leave it to the rich white dudes to decide what's racist, right?"

Mr. Wong, a spokesman for Chi-natown's Ming Sun Benevolent Society, said he took particular issue with those comparing possible property market curbs to the head tax, imposed in 1885 to deter Chinese immigration. Such comparisons were "complete bull," said Mr. Wong, who added that Singapore recently imposed restrictions on foreign buyers without being accused of racism. "People over here will say and do

Mr. Wong. "It's wrong. They use the term 'head tax' without even understanding the history behind it. It really appalls me." Messers. Rennie, Ransford, Muir and Somerville have all said that evidence tying Vancouver prices whatever they can to stop any ef-from making more money," said

forts that would prevent them to immigration is anecdotal. But there is a range of statistical support for the case. UBC's Prof. David Ley, holder of the Canada Research Chair in Geography, has long studied links between international immigration to Vancouver and home prices there. In his 2010 book, Millionaire Migrants, the Oxford-educated researcher found an 'unusually decisive" +0.94 correlation between the two factors (in which +1 represents movement in perfect correlation, -1 represents movement in exactly opposite directions, and o total randomness). This correlation far exceeded that between prices and interest rates (-0.12), rental vacancies (-0.03), unemployment (0.16) and other conventional correlates.

Dr. Ley's conclusions are bolstered by a 2011 study by Landcor Data, which pored over sales records in Richmond and Vancouver's West End to discover that 74 per cent of all luxury purchases in 2010 were made by buyers with purely mainland Chinese names. "What some have underplayed or dismissed as apocryphal 'as told by Realtors,' is underpinned by educated numbers," said Landcor.

The sheer number of millionaire migrants who have poured into Vancouver is also compelling: From 2005 to 2012, 36,973 arrived in B.C. under the nowdefunct immigrant investor program, which imposed a wealth benchmark of $1.6-million on applicants. Before being frozen in 2012, the scheme was the world's most popular wealth-migration device, with Chinese immigrants planning to settle in B.C. submitting 65 per cent of all applications in 2011. Chinese domination of wealth migration to Vancouver is a statistical fact that belies widespread belief in other reservoirs of rich newcomers, B.C. admitted 30,013 millionaire migrants from Greater China (including Taiwan and Hong Kong) from 2005 to 2012. In that period, there were 242 from Britain and 160 from the United States. Thousands of the rich have also moved to Vancouver after first arriving in Quebec under that province's own immigrant investor program. According to Ottawa, 90 per cent of Quebec's millionaire migrants move elsewhere within five years, mostly to Vancouver. That likely adds 20,000 or more millionaire migrants to Vancouver's tally in the 2005-2012 period.

Sid Chow Tan, a founder and director of the Head Tax Families Society of Canada, said "resentment" of the influx of millionaires to Vancouver cuts across racial boundaries. He said previous Chinese immigrants paid "a very much higher price" than investor migrants for their Canadian citizenship "and it was not measured in dollars, either."

Mr. Tan scoffed at real estate figures raising the spectre of the head tax: "I've been engaged in anti-racism work for decades. Conflating the Chinese head tax and exclusion laws and rich immigrants and real estate is absurd, if not somewhat evil."

Mr. Rennie, who warned against repeating discriminatory "patterns of the past" in his speech, told me his views were informed by diversity. "My in-laws come from Japan, my children are half-Japanese, we [Mr. Rennie's headquarters] are in the oldest building in Chinatown," he said. He said the subject was a touchy one. "Everybody has to watch when they are talking about racism, that they aren't trying to be opportunistic, and it bends to the answer that they want, whether it is to exclude or include. So it's a very dangerous

On this, Tan agreed, but suggested Mr. Rennie and others in the property industry steer clear of attempting advocacy on behalf of the Chinese community. "Bob Rennie standing up for the Chinese community? What Chinese community? Real estate investors and landowners. That's the community he's standing up for."

Ian Young is the Vancouver correspondent for The South China Morning Post and the author of its Hongcouver blog.

Special to The Globe and Mail

ON SITE » BY SYDNIA YU

FREETOPS AT HIDDEN VALLEY HUNTSVILLE, ONT.

Muskoka, heavy on the amenities

DEVELOPER Club Leisure

1,023 to 1,592 square feet

$279,900 to $464,900

SALES CENTRE

1 TreeTops Lane, off Deerhurst Drive in Huntsville. Open Thursday to Monday from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m.

1-855-784-9990 or visit treetopshuntsville.com

s a long-time cottager and A condo-suite owner at Deerhurst Resort, developer Ad Marco believes he has an intimate understanding of how buyers want to spend their limited time and resources in Muskoka.

So he is creating a collection of maintenance-free, luxury residences in the wooded hillside of a ski club – just steps from a lake, resort and golf course – and priced a less than half a million dollars each.

"Rather than create everything from scratch, we went into the middle of an area with all the amenities you can think of," says Mr. Marco, who is a partner at Club Leisure.

"So the dollar per square foot is on average $270 to $280 [whereas neighbouring] new units are running up to $400

The 12-acre project, called TreeTops at Hidden Valley, will encompass 120 suites distributed within 13 buildings on surplus land at Hidden Valley Highlands ski area, overlooking Peninsula Lake and Deerhurst Lakeside Golf Course.

"People that come in, you can be quiet, comfortable and peace-

Hidden Valley get a membership to ful overlooking the views, but you can also be as active as you want," says Mr. Marco, who notes monthly fees averaging $573 will include utilities, operating an on-site clubhouse and pool, and membership fee to the ski club.

In addition, residents will be across the road from restaurants and a spa at Deerhurst Resort, and a short drive to shops, theatre and hospital in downtown Huntsville. Each season will bring a wide range of activities, from sailing and swimming to snowmobiling and skating, as well as a change of scenery.

"Muskoka is a lovely part of the world," Mr. Marco says. "As we went up on the hill, it's amazing how the views are."

A model suite in the first building showcases Bryon Patton's mix of natural stone and wood finishes with contemporary conveniences, such as stainless steel appliances, floating bathroom vanities and radiant heated floors.

Next year, occupancy begins for phase two - a trio of threelevel structures with 24 two- and three-bedroom units with open principal rooms.

Mortgage Interest Rate now only 2.77% 4-Year Fixed Rate*

Apply today for a TD Mortgage

With various mortgage interest rates, terms and special offers, you can find the mortgage that's right for you.

Visit a branch or tdcanadatrust.com/mortgagerates

*Assuming no additional fees are charged, the Annual Percentage Rate is the same as the interest rate. Some conditions apply. Offer may be changed, extended or withdrawn at any time without notice. ® The TD logo and other trade-marks are the property of The Toronto-Dominion Bank.